Internship opportunity for promising student

We are looking to employ a Māori intern to assist on environmental projects at our vibrant central Wellington offices.

This is a valuable opportunity for a promising young student or graduate to experience working in an independent research “think tank” with top internationally recognised researchers and people with extensive public policy knowledge.

The experience will also provide a good introduction to how your future work and research could impact on wider contexts and policy. We also see this as an opportunity for building longer term relationships between current and future researchers, and between research and policy communities and Iwi, with a view to improving New Zealand research questions and policy outcomes.

Some economics and/or statistics (or tertiary experience in subjects such as geography, finance or public policy) is desirable, although not mandatory. The key characteristics we seek are intelligence, motivation, and interest in the issues we study.

To apply, send your cover letter, CV and academic record to Rhylie Alexander at rhylie.alexander@motu.org.nz. The position remains open until we find the right candidate, so early applications are encouraged.
